What Does Demerol Treat?

Demerol, marketed under the generic name meperidine, is used to treat moderate to severe pain. Similar to morphine, it belongs to a class of drugs called opioid (narcotic) analgesics. Demerol is intended for short-term use (such as post-surgery), it can be taken in liquid or tablet form to alleviate sudden onsets of pain. If they use Demerol for more than 3-4 weeks, patients can become physically and psychologically dependent on it.

Signs of Demerol Addiction

Persistent Demerol use can lead to opioid use disorder, characterized by unusual or risky behaviors such as using the drug in dangerous situations and taking increasing amounts of it over time as tolerance develops. Drug abuse often leads to relationship difficulties. People who are addicted frequently go to such great lengths to satisfy their drug cravings that they neglect major responsibilities and no longer participate in activities they once enjoyed.

Physical signs of Demerol abuse may include:

- drowsiness
- confusion
- euphoria
- nausea, vomiting, or constipation
- small pupils
- slowed breathing

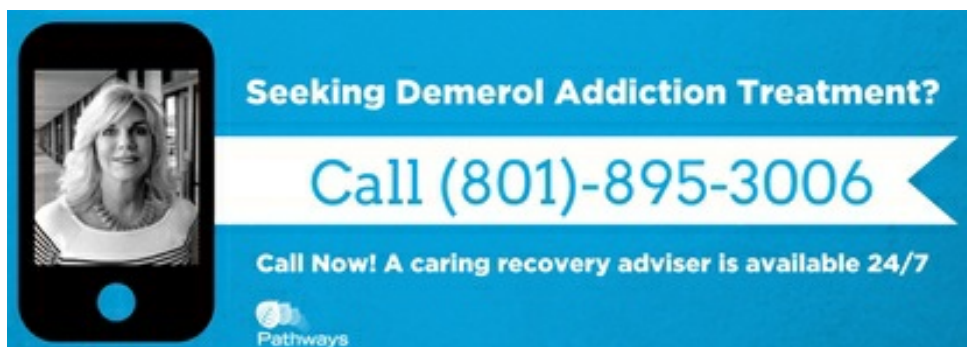

The drug is especially likely to become habit-forming for those who have battled an addiction to alcohol or other drugs before. Additionally, because Demerol becomes less effective over time, people may take higher doses of it to achieve the desired effect, leading to addiction.

Signs of Demerol Withdrawal

If you suddenly stop taking Demerol after using it for a while, you may exhibit physical signs of withdrawal, including:

- restlessness
- involuntary leg movements
- muscle aches
- sweating
- cold flashes
- watery eyes
- runny nose
- dilated pupils
- gastrointestinal problems (nausea, diarrhea)

Psychological symptoms of withdrawal include anxiety, agitation, and insomnia.
